Prologue

Wide Green eye's peaked from behind a hood as shouts and cries ran circles around the town at night; fire light danced wickedly licking at the stone walls and casting shadows of monsters thirsting for blood. The eyes brimmed with animalistic fear, the only thought of that to get away. The figure turned with a flourish her cloak flying behind her as she went wheeling down the street towards the docks. She reached the end and looking at the clear moon as it peaked from behind a curtain of clouds, her breathing was short, coming out in chocked gasps as tears started to trickle down her face. The woman brought out a necklace and kissed the feathers hanging from it before stepping off into the grips of the icy water. Her grave at the bottom of the sea.

A door creaked on the loose hinge it hung from as similar green eyes wavered from behind a closed passage way. Eyes that had seen too much yet had understood little of it, the breathing was soft like a small animal. No one noticed it, no one cared to notice it. Then it was gone.
